About the Report

The Pakistan flood of 2010 has been cited as unprecedented and amongst the most devastating natural calamities of contemporary times.

The report suggests a move away from the usual approach of demarcating areas according to intensity of disaster or creating economically weighed zones around poverty indicators of most developed or least developed districts. With reference to a gender-specific lens, it may be of relevance to consider a more sociologically attuned mapping that amalgamates districts into cultural zones that challenge provincial boundaries.
